Danger in the Tunnel.

"Two or three railroad firemen cut off from home while at duty by the catastrophe were returning to seek news of the families. They preceded me, brandishing resinous smoky torches. We marched in Indian file through the tunnel from Palmi to Bagnara, holding hands and stumbling over bailast heaps. The roof of the tunnel was cracked everywhere and now and then rocks fell in the niches of the track. Whole families were encamped around wood fires and smoking torches. Many of them were wounded. Men, women and children, stupefied by the catastrophe, and crouching among the stones, looked at us with a vac int glare as if their thoughts were wandering. interesting picture of the daily life of his still more famous uncle, the elder Pliny. The younger Pliny gives us a gentleman's word for it that when his uncle had withdrawn from the distractions of the city to his country estate only the time of the bath was exempted from his literary labors. And then, for fear of being mistaken, he specifies that he means only the time when the old gentleman was actually in the water. While the slave attendants were doing the scraping and rubbing essential to the bath of a Roman aristocrat, a reader stood by, filling his master's insatlate mind with the contents of some useful book.

When the nephew was obliged to traverse the streets of Rome he was accustomed to walk. But Horace had long before found out that one could not devote himself to letters while walking the streets of Rome. There were the muddy swine to rush under your feet and trip you up, the huge timber on its way to the top of some new skyscraping tenement ready to slip its leashing and fall on your head, or the heavy funeral wagons ready to run you down. Evidently the brains of him who walked the streets of Rome must be right at home, and not off to the haunts of even the streets of Rome must be right at home, and not off to the haunts of even the streets of the Muses. So the elder Pliny, when obliged to use the streets, had himself carried in a litter with his reader at his side, or an amanuensis, if he was in the mood for producing rather than absorbing. And when traveling in cold weather, he saw to it that the hands of the amanuensis were carefully protected, that frost-stiffened fingers might entail no loss of precious time. His nephew's habit of going on foot he severely censured, because of its manifest sacrifice of moments which might have been turned to mental improvement. That admonitions of this kind were not wholly lost, we may infer from the fact that the young man, when out boarwholly lost, we may infer from the fact that the young man, when out boar-hunting one day, sat with his spear by
